SECRET TO A WELL KNOWN GIRL.

The Principal Actor a Well Known Maysville Girl-- The Victim a Former Maysville Man.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., August 25th.—The sequel to the Stillwell murder case, which occasioned so much excitement at Hannibal, Mo., in 1888, is contained in an announcement made this morning in local papers of a divorce just granted to Fannie and Amos J. Stillwell, now residents of this city.

Prior to her marriage to Dr. Hearne, the plaintiff in this case was the wife of Amos J. Stillwell, a wealthy packer of Hannibal, who met his death in the most shocking manner. Charges connected with the case upon which the decree of divorce has just been ordered were cruelty and failure to provide, and were made, it appears, on a previous understanding, so defense being presented when the case came to trial.

Persons cognizant of the relations existing between the doctor and his wife have been looking for the institution of the suit for legal separation, their disagreement being the subject for common remark.

Indeed, it was stated by friends of Mrs. Hearne that she had been deterred only by fear of personal violence from filing the complaint long ago, containing even more sensational charges against the doctor than that of cruelty directed against herself. They have now residents of this city for some years. Dr. Hearne being one of the most prominent physicians in the city. They lived in a fine house at the corner of First and Laurel streets, until the present trouble led to the breaking up of the family, since which time the doctor has made his home at the corner of Fourth and Ash streets, where his offices are located.

Mrs. Hearne, or Mrs. Stillwell, as she is now called, for she was permitted by the terms of the decree to resume the name of her former husband, is spending the winter at her home with her daughter Mary and two sons. Dr. Hearne's two daughters, fruit of his former marriage, are visiting their home at Hannibal, where the marriage took place. No children were born to the union. At the trial evidence was elicited showing the doctor to be a man most unscrupulously capable of the use of profane and abusive language being one of the offenses laid to his charge. But the incidents in the history of the doctor and his wife when engaged in heated arguments were referred to by witnesses for the prosecution.

These complaints are said, however, to have been merely a suggestion of the evidence which it would have been possible to introduce in case there had been a contest. Intimate relations alleged to have been sustained by the doctor with various women of San Diego are said to have afforded material for more vigorous prosecution of the case, but being advised of the material at hand the doctor wisely allowed the case to go by default.

Mrs. Stillwell has been contemplating a trip to Europe for some time past, but has been prevented by the severe illness of her daughter. Dr. Hearne insists that the principal ground of disagreement between himself and wife has been incompatibility of temperament and says that his wife's daughter Mary has had a most disturbing influence in the household. It is known, however, that he was averse to a divorce, and certain of a sensational nature are said to have been made by him to prevent the filing of the complaint. It is even alleged by those who have persisted in seeking divorce. To this she has been replied with spirit, denying him the right of even making a claim that he stood on dangerous ground.

After the filing of the complaint by his wife he went to La Jolla and calling at the cottage occupied by her with children, he was denied entrance, but forced his way within the house and going to the door of Mrs. Hearne's room, which was locked, burst his way in with an axe.

These circumstances were well known to persons staying at La Jolla and led to inquiry regarding the cause of their disagreement. The antecedents of the family were investigated with the result that all details known regarding the tragedy at Hannibal have become known to the public. It is with reference to them that the greatest interest is felt. On coming to this state Dr. and Mrs. Hearne located at Los Angeles, but the story of their Hannibal antecedents followed them here, and they finally came to this city, where they have held a high social position. The doctor being in successful practice here.

All persons indebted to me are asked to call at once and settle.

Dr. G. M. PHILLIPS.

The Man from Maysville will get there with both feet if you will give him a chance. Mr. Will S. Cady, formerly of this city, now of Frankfort, has been appointed to a good position in the Government Printing Office at Washington City, and will leave for that place this week.

Well, Will, here's a tip, hoping you will be satisfied some day.

spell of a pair of witching eyes and a soft, musical voice that sent a thrill through his old bones. There were tears in his eyes, and he still stayed. At last he went away. The neighbors saw signs of busy preparations at the Anderson home. It was announced that Mr. Stillwell would stop on his return to Missouri. He did not stay long this time. When he resumed his journey he was accompanied by a young girl who might have been his daughter, but was, in fact, his bride. From the veil of a no-wedding of a bride is a fact, but Fannie Anderson was young and had perhaps mistaken her best friend's long, the looked enchantingly beautiful by the side of her husband as they started to the station, followed by the conventional fusillade of rice and discarded footware. Perhaps not more successful than when after years she drove away again a bride. But ah, what changes time brings forth!

Amos Stillwell's return to Hannibal is still remembered by the old residents of the place. The first intimation that his friends had that he was not alone was when a telegram came stating that he would arrive the next morning with his wife and driving directions to leave the town entered into the enjoyment of a genuine sensation. Society people could not conceive their impulse to see the new master of the local 60. When they were at last permitted to behold her they saw a very self-contained young woman who was prepared to confess, was fitted by nature and education to fill the station in which fortune had placed her. Her bearing satisfied them that some score, she resumed its normal functions. Mr. Stillwell's bride came to be a sensation, and the town turned out to discuss the prospect of a new lady in town and to speculation as to the next spring rise.

II.

THE GREENCASTLE BRIDE A WIDOW.

Many changes had been made at the Stillwell mansion. The house was overhauled and made modern. It was newly furnished and decorated throughout. Even the carriages of the late Mrs. Stillwell were obliged to admit that her successor had exquisite taste. Mr. Stillwell himself participated in the general overturning. In his office he was supreme. His will was law, from which there was no appeal. But he ceased to govern when he entered the portals of matrimony over which he had ruled so long. The contrast was very great. It was the more noticeable for the reason that the millionaire seemed pleased with the new order of things. Some intimate friends called on the Stillwells one evening after the marriage. Chairs were brought outside that they might enjoy the summer air. The breeze from the river grew sharper and Mr. Stillwell expressed a wish for a wrap. Her husband sprang a key to get it for him. As the twilight deepened Mrs. Stillwell said:

"Amos, light the gas and we will go in."

"Isn't it pleasant out here? I always enjoyed a bit of summer evening," ventured the millionaire.

"I prefer to go indoors, Amos. Light the gas, please."

With a laugh he arose to perform his wife's mandate, but his friends saw that he was hurt.

All that did not have his own way, the old pork packer's second marriage was far happier than his first. He loved his Fannie, and she loved him. He recognized his power and saw in what universal esteem he was held, and if he did not love him he recognized his power. But cause to believe the union only strengthened the tie, and Amos Stillwell was accounted one of the most fortunate of men. He did not forget the suffering of his early life, and young Dick was well found in an ideal stepmother. Indeed, she frequently interceded in his behalf. His father was a stern disciplinarian with him, and it was not surprising that he grew to entertain a strong liking for her.

Years passed and Mrs. Stillwell prospered. Two other children came to his home, Karl and Harriet. He did not grow old like most men. He was really becoming more determined not to. He made a study of the human body, and endeavored to live according to its laws. He slept on a hard bed, without springs, and he ate no food but what was good for the morning was to save wood for half an hour. He became a vegetarian. His one hobby was by living to live long.

Although her husband was never ill, Mrs. Stillwell and the children sometimes were. Dr. Hearne, a son of one of the most successful physicians in Hannibal. He was also an eminent surgeon, and had been Secretary of the State Board of Health. He became Mrs. Stillwell's family physician. The pork packer's residence fronted on Fifth street, and was a two-story building. Mrs. Stillwell's building in front of Broadway and extended along an alley almost to the Stillwell barn. The doctor was a widower with two children.

Whether Mrs. Stillwell's ailments required the constant care of her physician, only those who were in the secret can tell. But it is certain that it was a very frequent. Unkind persons began to talk in an unpleasant way, but evil people are prone to live long.

On the night of December 28, 1888, Mr. and Mrs. Stillwell attended a card party at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Munger. The best people of the town were there. Among the guests were Dr. Hearne and Mrs. Stillwell. She was in high spirits. His wife, dressed as she always was, in the height of fashion, looked her best. She too enjoyed herself. She played with so much interest that when the prizes were announced she had won the first. At midnight the host broke up, everybody leaving at about the same time.

As the millionaire walked home under the moonlight he was happy and content. He was a good man, and he was a good husband. He was a good father, and he was a good friend. He was a good man, and he was a good husband. He was a good father, and he was a good friend.

buried her head in the covers and weaned away. When she regained consciousness the old lady there took her to her room and she fled. Look at the blood-stained form of her dead husband, and seeing the youngest child dead with it to the nursing room on the floor. Arousing the girl she told the girl what had occurred, and sent her to bring the other women.

"Mr. Hearne was murdered by a burglar," she exclaimed, "and the children must not see him!" Then she had aroused the neighbors. An examination of the body revealed some strange things. There was a wound four and one-half inches long, and it was not a scratch. It began at the cheek bone, severing the lobe of the ear, opening the artery and bringing the blood. The blood had evidently been delivered by a person who understood something of anatomy, for the doctor said it had produced a fatal shock. The dead man's feet protruded from the bed in the direction of that lately occupied by Mrs. Stillwell and the children. Blood had flowed through the mattress to the floor. There was little blood under the body, and that part of the night which was under the covers was not blood stained. It was plain that the body had been moved after death. If Amos Stillwell moved at all after he was struck it was the next instant. In that case there would have been no pool of blood in the spot where he slept or under that place on the floor. When the neighbors were forced to confess, they found chairs with pillows piled upon them between the two beds. They also found the door of the nursing room locked and the key on the outside. Mrs. Stillwell said that she had turned the key after removing the children from the room.

The police made some startling discoveries. One of the back doors was open, but the bolt showed no signs of having been forced. On the stairs leading down to the first floor patterned matches were found, as well as some pieces of silver money. In the dining-room burned matches were found. Even the carriages of the late Mrs. Stillwell were obliged to admit that her successor had exquisite taste. Mr. Stillwell himself participated in the general overturning. In his office he was supreme. His will was law, from which there was no appeal. But he ceased to govern when he entered the portals of matrimony over which he had ruled so long. Hannibal was in a ferment. A most foul murder had been done. Experts had detected and the evidence was plain that the crime had not been committed for the purpose of robbery. Not a lock had been forced. If the culprit was not an inmate of the house, he had been admitted by someone on the inside. The people demanded a searching inquiry. None was made, and they grew more and more indignant.

There was a sale of the dead man's personal effects a few weeks after the tragedy. He had come from far and near. Several were gathered one evening in the parlors of the mansion. Mrs. Stillwell was recalled that she could not come down. Presently the front door opened, and Dr. Heame walked in without knocking, and hurried up stairs. The company talked until quite late. Toward midnight a step was heard on the stair. Dr. Heame came down and walked toward the door.

"You have forgotten your medicine case, Doctor," Mollie still well said to him. "No, I haven't," was the reply. "Your mother is very nervous and I shall be obliged to come back."

It occurred to some of those present that the family physician was indispensable to the widow of Amos Stillwell, and that he must have wonderful powers over her nervous system. Soon after this Dr. Heame announced that it would be necessary for his patient to undergo an operation, and that he would take her to Battle Creek, Mich., where she could secure rest and treatment at a sanitarium. Mrs. Stillwell would accompany them. Word came that the widow was much improved. In a few weeks she was able to return home. Before doing so, however, Mrs. Stillwell wrote to Lawyer R. S. Anderson, employing him to attend to her legal affairs. Mr. Anderson was the prosecuting attorney. He made the necessary arrangements to prevent her from attending to the details of business.

Mrs. Stillwell was not completely restored to health, as her friends soon learned. One day she saw a double-edged axe in the window of a hardware store and swooned away. At another time while crossing the street she came upon a laborer with pick pulled. She swooned again, crying, "Take it away!"

There were made enough to say that the widow's agitation was assumed; that she was acting a part, though they had to admit she did it well.

All this time the Grand Jury had been diligently at work. But somehow it could get at nothing tangible. The evidence was disquieting, after having left a sealed package containing all the evidence it had collected as a legacy to the next Grand Jury. It learned several important things, though. One of the jurors thought him that if one ax would which buried through the air another would. So they tried it and it made no noise at all. Indeed they experimented with the very ax the murderer used, with the same result. They then concluded that something must have made the "whirring" sound Mrs. Stillwell heard.

All things must have an end some time, and at last the case was closed. Without developing any solution of the tragedy, it gradually ceased to be discussed. Nearly a year had passed and the public had almost forgotten that there had been a murder, when someone said that Dr. Heame and Mrs. Stillwell were to be married. Formal announcement confirmed the rumor. The information of the people knew no bounds. They denounced the approaching nuptials as a reproach upon the community and demanded to know what had become of the law. These matters may or may not have reached the ears of Dr. Heame and his fiancée. At any rate they were married.

When they drove to the station to take the train their carriage was halted on the way. Did the fair bride remember the other wedding day and the rice and the slipper?

OUR FAILURE

To open our Shoe House September 1st as advertised was occasioned by Eastern manufacturers not shipping our goods according to promise, a great quantity of which has not yet been received. We will not be able to show our full assortment before the 13th inst. However, we have determined to throw open our doors for business SATURDAY, 8th, and accommodate our friends as best we can who have so kindly and patiently waited. Come to see us.

was placed in an academy for young ladies in Indiana. Dr. and Mrs. Heame continued their journey to St. Joseph. In a few weeks they with their children went to Los Angeles, Cal. Various and conflicting reports came from there. One was to the effect that Mrs. Heame's mind was giving way. Another that she was about to sue for divorce. All were afterwards denied.

Meanwhile another Grand Jury had been in session at Hannibal. The Stillwell murder occupied its attention, as it had that of every Grand Jury since the tragedy. Like its predecessor this Grand Jury reviewed the testimony, expressed regret that so great a crime should go so long un punished and the hope that some future Grand Jury might receive conclusive evidence upon which to bring indictments. Then it adjourned.

More than a year before Richard Stillwell offered a reward of $10,000 for the capture and conviction of his father's slayer. He imposed but one condition—that the detectives should not conduct any investigation upon the theory that the murderer gained entrance to the house through collusion with someone on the inside. His friends say that he would give $20,000 to see his father's butcher dagger at a rope's end, but that he loves his sister and little brothers too well to see them suffer for a crime of which they are innocent. And the Stillwell murder remains as much of a mystery as it was on that December morning when Mrs. Stillwell heard the whirring of the pretty feet on the cruel stairs when she ran half clothed across the street to tell Dr. Allen of the tragedy.

The Confederate veterans at Mayfield gave General Gordon an enthusiastic reception upon the occasion of the beginning of his lecture tour in this state. The General will lecture at the Opera house this city Friday evening next.

A Cincinnati bicycle man has taken an immense contract. He has agreed to equip one of Mayville's former citizens with a wheel warranted not to bend nor break. The gentleman who created a securing wheel of such high grade is Mr. Joseph W. Grimes, who weighs just exactly 44 pounds. He says that if the wheel fits him he'll enter the Poorman road race next year. The bicycle is to be made of 16-gauge steel piping and when completed will weigh only thirty-five pounds.

The Monk!

By MATTHEW G. LEWIS, (MONK LEWIS.)

Mr. Lewis was a member of the British Parliament, and his book became so popular in England a hundred years ago that it gained for him the title of "Monk Lewis."

It is a piece of classic composition, and after being out of print for many years it has been republished from the original text.

It is far superior to "Maria Mont" and books of that character.
